The red eagle from Kurbrandenburg

(Flags in the second half of the 17th century, are mainly for ships built in Havelberg).

Parts of two authentic flags from 1675 (retouched photos). One flag was found in a small village near Havelberg, the other was found approx. 40 km away in another village. However, only the back side of the second flag is intact, due to improper storage for many years.

According to framing and inscriptions both flags were never used at sea, but were village flags.

Although they were manufactured by different manufacturers (judging by the different handicraft and materials used), both show the same form of the eagle and the Kurhut (the hat above the eagle, symbolizing the right to take part in election of the German Kaiser).

So one can suppose that these forms were widely used, most probably also at sea and by the military.

The appearance of the eagle confirms the contemporary mocking name "red cock".

It is striking that both carry neither sword nor breast shield or imperial apple, but only a scepter in one claw.

This speaks against the representation in some oil paintings and drawings which has led to a prevailing image of the appearance of this flag.

As long as no other authentic findings clarify these differences, it is up to the model maker what kind of flag he uses.

Remark:

All marine flags show a mirror-image on their back side, including the eagles and other figures and letters or symbols. There are only very few exceptions, where the writing on a flag must be readable on the back side.

This illustration is a contemporary drawing (taken from a book of Whitney Smith, Flag Research Center, "Die Zeichen der Menschen und Völker", ISBN 3-7243-0115-4, Reich-Verlag, Luzern (1975), page 55) A similar representation is given by Norry / Hobbs, however, here the eagle looks to the flag pole. Either both was in use that time, or one of the drawers has made a mistake. Both show, however, the eagle without any accessories like scepter, breast shield or sword.
